

"At a time when all of us are rightfully concerned about what our children are finding on the internet and hearing on the daily news, I must admit I had deep reservations about this vote. Before the vote today, this was not a public document. It was a report in a criminal investigation. We don't know its contents, but the media have reported it contains materials of a salacious and graphic nature. I certainly would not want any child to read it. No one, not even the most partisan among us, takes any joy in this. Given the seriousness and gravity of the situation, Congress must exercise incredible restraint throughout this process."
